

It is always nice to see the release of an iOS client for a web service that has been around for quite a while. The good thing about such apps is the way they usually offer cross-platform syncing, therefore making something even as simple as a text editor way more useful than other applications of its kind. We covered WorkFlowy a few months back, highlighting its features as a note-taking and task management utility offering comprehensive bulleting

. The service is pretty useful as a web app, but imagine the possibilities if you have access to such a powerful to-do list manager on the go. That's exactly what the new iOS app for WorkFlowy intends to do. The iPhone app is quite similar to the web one, and packs all the simplicity and efficiency that you require from a good note-taking app. You can search through your notes using the app's universal search feature, and sync all your notes and to-do lists with your account, making everything available across all your devices.
